The pandemic & child abuse

We know how to report child abuse.
Do we know how to prevent it?

Can we be not just mandated reporters,
but mandated supporters?
Goal: empower communities to prevent child maltreatment before it ever happens by supporting and strengthening families through everyday actions

Culture of surveillance → Culture of support

“I had a neighbor call the cops on me. My daughter had just come back from foster care, and the transition was hard for her. She was having a meltdown. I explained this to the cop. He said, “I understand. You’re doing a good job.’ And he left. I went to my neighbor and explained the situation to her, too. She apologized. I asked her to please ask me if I needed help before calling the authorities on me again.”

“In Somerton, a member of the town council holds an “exercise boot camp” for families. It’s a way for them to engage and stay healthy. Through the program, you can see children improve behaviorally and physically.”

“When I became a teacher, I realized that some teachers judge parents a lot. I’m a mother of a special needs child, and when I heard other teachers making judgments on things like dirty shirts, I wondered what teachers had been saying about my child and my parenting. Instead of judging, we should be asking ourselves how you can help.”

“Listening is one of the best gifts we can provide to anyone. I’ve noticed, during the pandemic, that we’re going through situations that we’ve never gone through before. Make sure they feel like they aren’t the only ones. I tell them: you aren’t the first one who doesn’t know how to get through this.”

“I met a family who yelled whenever they talked to each other. At first glance, I was concerned, but through further observation, I recognized that there was love and safety in this family. They were loud, but the yelling was not abusive- it was cultural. Through a parenting class, the grandmother learned tools to use a gentler approach, if she wished.”

“Once, an older couple walked up to me while my four-year old son was melting down, and said “you’re doing great.” I felt so supported, I was walking on air.”

Why
• “The children can’t survive if the parents aren’t surviving. For parents to survive, the community needs to support them, and we’re all part of that community.”

What
• Lens-shift: uplift and support parents

How (tips and tools)

Offer help proactively and specifically
It is hard to ask for help, but everyone needs it in varying degrees. Create an environment in which asking for it is normal. Offer to be helpful before the family needs help. Tell them what kind of help you want to offer.

Checking your biases
The idealized “normal” American family bears a distinctly white, middle-class standard. It’s rational to have a bias based on our own standards and experiences, but keep in mind that we are a multicultural society with a shrinking middle class.

Our communities are full of loving families across the full range of cultural, race, and income classifications. Check your biases and perceptions to be able to meet families where they are and approach who they are.
LISTEN MORE; TALK LESS
You can change a person’s life by learning their story. Listen actively. Hear their story, especially before giving advice.

KNOW YOUR NEIGHBORS
Reaching out and knowing each other is protective of the whole community. Building relationships around you reduces the need to call the authorities.

MODEL BEHAVIOR
Model good parenting in public. You never know who is watching or learning.

SPREAD THE WORD
Use social media to stay connected and share information that uplifts caregivers, normalizes the stress of parenting, and connects families to resources.
BUILD SAFE SPACES

Some groups who have experienced discrimination may need safe spaces to share knowledge and support each other. From there, they can connect one another to resources they trust, and build a circle of trust together.

VALUE DIVERSITY

Affirm the beauty of culture. A strong culture helps build identity and belongingness, which humans need to thrive. Value, promote, and respect cultural practices they strengthen family resilience.

BE A SEARCH ENGINE

Do the research for parents. Offer to help them find resources. Make it known that you’re good at finding information if they ever need anything.

SEE THEIR STRENGTHS

When someone’s behavior bothers you, ask yourself, “What happened to them?” rather than “What’s wrong with them?” Help parents know their worth. Tell them about the positives and the strengths you see in them.
EDUCATE RATHER THAN DENIGRATE

Shame is not a good learning tool. Assume parents are trying their best. They may not have the time, capacity or desire to attend a parenting class or group.

Start education efforts where parents are, like children’s sports events. That’s where natural connections develop. Educate and communicate without expectation. Don’t be offended if they don’t follow advice.

DON'T TAKE IT PERSONALLY

Stressed parents may find it hard to accept help, especially if they find it hard to trust people because of their past experiences. In a crisis situation, you can say, “You don’t have a reason to trust me, but I’m on your team.”

BE A CALMING PRESENCE

Only through calm can you create calm. Children learn calm from their parents, but it can be difficult to be a calm parent. When you observe parents stress, stay calm. Being a calm community member can help parents stay calm.

BE A PARENT ALLY

Consider yourself an ambassador to the success of parents and families. Allies can assume the roles of middlemen, culture guides, and advocates. Tap the power of elders, who can assume the roles of grandparents and mentors.

STORYTIME FOR GROWN-UPS

Put observations in a third person. Tell a story about another person when you offer suggestions. “My friend did this and it worked.” Speak about the times that you’ve received help. It takes leaders to normalize help-seeking.

watch your language

Catch yourself when you negatively talk about people receiving government assistance, or other forms of concrete help. Instead, you can change social norms to normalize help-seeking by saying something like, “I’m glad they’re getting what they need. We all need help sometimes.”

Treasure Children

Be kind whenever you’re in the presence of a child. Strike a positive conversation with children. Talk to children to make them feel like they’re part of the community.

Acknowledge their strengths, effort, and feelings. Help build children’s social skills by modeling humility, character, courtesy, and kindness.

Convene. Show up

Host events that offer parents a break and childcare. Give parents the opportunity to focus on self-care on a regular basis. Social media groups can be a great way to find others with common interests, who share your challenges, or are in similar phases of life.
Say the magic words

Acknowledge your desire to help with the right words. “I want to help you. What can I do to help you?” If you hear others saying something judgemental or negative to a parent in a stressful situation, run interference. Get closer and say something like, “It looks like she’s trying her best.”

Normalize Stress

Every parent experiences stress. It’s not a weak or a failure to feel it. It’s normal. We don’t learn self-regulation and healthy coping if we don’t first recognize we are stressed. Look for signs of stress in parents and do what you can do to relieve it. Acts of kindness and caring de-escalate stressful situations.

Honor Bravery

It’s not easy for parents to ask for help, and it shouldn’t hurt to ask. If parents seek assistance, offer encouragement that they did the right thing. Tell them, “You’re not the first one or the last one to need help.” It takes leaders to normalize help-seeking. Speak about the times that you’ve received help.

Be the village

Start connecting with people around you or your block, or in your apartment complex. Bring back “welcome wagons” introduce yourself to new neighbors. Create or show up at community events.

Organize potlucks for parents that could include clothing swaps. Go beyond asking about the children; asks parents how they are doing. Really listen.
